Abstract

As two fast-growing economies with huge populations, China and India have become formidable forces in the world today. How do these two Asian giants see each other? Are they economic partners, political equals, and friendly neighbors? Or are they economic competitors, political rivals, and territorial enemies when it comes to border conflicts? This research attempts to answer some of the above questions

Background

China and India are recognized as the fastest growing economies in the world

The economic relations between China and India have shown significant improvement in the past decades

China has become India's largest trading partner and India has emerged as the 9th largest trade partner of China

Conclusion

• China and India are partners, competitors, and rivals all at the same time.

• Both China and India feel most comfortable in cooperating with each other in economic areas. It is possible to spill over to collaborations in other areas, such as cultural and religious exchange, regional stability, and even border reconciliation.

• China and India are both confronted with daunting tasks of a huge population, a large number of people living in poverty, wide gaps between the rich and the poor, and serious and persistent corruption.

• China and India compete for natural resources, labor resources, nuclear technology and geopolitical power. It is very hard for the two countries to dramatically improve their relationship in a short time.
